

sons and their families and this gives them kind of something to do. They go to the sale barns and they buy single head of livestock. They are referred to in the trade as "small lot brokers" and they take these livestock home and they work up a lot that is big enough to hire a truck and then haul them off somewhere to a larger market. So they do serve a function in the livestock business by brokering these small lots and getting them to the larger sale barns. As I said, nobody ever asks them to see this license because the sale barn itself is licensed and they are responsible for their own bookkeeping there. Some of these people have told me that as a result of holding this license which nobody ever wants to see, they quite frequently have a state car pull into their yard and there is one or two state inspectors there and they say, well, we understand you have a license, I guess we need to inspect you and see what kind of an operation you are running here. Well, this, you know, doesn't really fill any useful purpose either. So many of these people meet up and know people that come in across the state lines to these sale barns. None of these people have to have a state license from Nebraska to come in and buy and sell livestock. So I would just hope that you would kind of go in the spirit of what we did here the other day. We had a state law that all the feedlot operators should have a grain dealer's license and a bond and we quite generously let all of them off the hook and I don't know how many thousands of dollars we lost from our revenue from doing that so I would just kind of hope that you would let our senior citizens who are still doing a useful purpose off the hook and not slam a triple price on a license for them. Thank you.
