SENATOR WARNER: That's fine. What the amendment does, those of you who were here yesterday will recall Senator Chambers, in reading the bill, raised the issue that the way the bill is drafted that it...and, again, you remember this takes effect in the case of some emergency...but the way the bill was drafted, it just said one of the conditions was from an enemy attack, had the words "upon the United States" was stricken language. And what this amendment does is simply creates, inserts for clarification from enemy attack, it puts back the words "upon the United States or terrorist attack or natural disaster upon this state." Again, to refresh your mind, this is a bill coming from the Constitutional Revision Commission. Originally, there was discussion in the commission whether there was a need to retain a provision that was enacted back in the 1950s for any type of enemy attack. That was when we had nuclear concerns, the nuclear bomb concerns, which has not totally gone away because then as the body, the Constitutional Revision Commission discussed it further, they decided it was probably still appropriate, but perhaps to reflect current conditions, that we should also indicate that these same provisions would be available in case of a terrorist attack or a major natural disaster which so disrupted the flow of state government, and if there were officials who were no longer able to function because of a major terrorist attack or were killed, that there was a process that would return and maintain civilian control, civilian operation of government, and I think that's important. So all the amendment does is clarifies the issue that Senator Chambers brought up, and then that the enemy attack would be one upon the United States. I'd move adoption of the amendment.

SENATOR CROSBY: Thank you, Senator Warner. Your light was next, Senator Warner. Do you need any further time? Thank you. Senator Chambers.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Madam President, members of the Legislature, I am still opposed to the amendment however it is drafted, but I am not going to spend a lot of time on it this morning. I will let it move forward and maybe I'll attack it on Select. I am not really sure, but it is one of those that when we get to the final countdown I probably will not support. But think about this a moment, is Senator Withem here? Senator Withem, I'd like to ask you a question.
