when the silverware is out on the table. So what I am offering is a bludgeoning, this afternoon, Senator Aguilar. I am kneading, not n-e-e-d-i-n-g, but in the way that you knead dough, I am kneading the process. I am adding a bit of yeast, I want to leaven it. But there won't be enough time to let it sit and rise naturally. So, if heat makes it rise, Senator Redfield, we need a good infusion or overlay of hot air, and the hot air is being provided this afternoon, but not by me, Senator Schimek. The Legislature is the place where we pass laws; they ought to be wise and just laws. If a law is on the books, most people feel that it should be obeyed. But before I become too sure of that and too presumptuous, I would like to ask the most conservative person on the floor a question. Let me see who earns that title? Since nobody has listened, I can give it to whomever I want to, so Senator Jensen has volunteered. Senator Jensen, I would like to ask you a question.

PRESIDENT MAURSTAD: Senator Jensen.

SENATOR JENSEN: Yes.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Somebody said my friend "Baron" Tyson is not here, I said conservative, not reactionary. Senator Jensen, if a law is on the books, do you believe that law ought to be obeyed by those who make laws?

SENATOR JENSEN: Yes.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Suppose they disagree with the law?

PRESIDENT MAURSTAD: One minute.

SENATOR JENSEN: They still ought to obey it.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Why?

SENATOR JENSEN: Because it's a...it was the statute and it's a law that is before us and they should obey it.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: And when they take that oath, do they swear to uphold the laws and so forth of the state...
