may be like me, a teetotaler, don't even use medicine, maybe because I can't afford it. But you are charged with something in Nebraska and they want to punish you more severely by saying you did something in another state when you lived there 11 1/2 years ago, and what you did violated a city ordinance, let's say a village ordinance. This little village on the edge of a meadow, a very bucolic scene, you can look out your window and in the morning you can smell the dew. You can see the clear blue sky. The birds just awakening in the morning, Senator...that's not Senator Baker, Senator Dickey, and just twittering to each other because they are so happy for a new day. And the early bird has already gotten the worm, so the rest of them go hungry the rest of the day but, nevertheless, you are in a setting like that, so you did something in that little village which violates a village ordinance. And who lives in the village? Your family which are the Hatfields, and this other family which is the McCoy family. And there happened to be more McCoy's than Hatfields, so everybody in office is a McCoy, and the real McCoy sits as the judge. So every time a Hatfield comes to court, McCoy finds him or her guilty, and that is on the Hatfield's record, so the Hatfield comes to Nebraska, and in checking out the background, that's what you find. And this Hatfield wants to explain to you, the judge, what is going on in that little village and the problem between the Hatfields and the McCoy's and the judge says I don't want to hear it. We have a piece of paper here that says you were convicted and that's all I need to go by. This might be a long way around, but to try to show how sometimes in villages judge...judgments are based on an ad hoc system that would hardly be called just any place else. There is no place to turn, nobody to go to. Let's say you're an unpopular person in a small town. You all remember the story of the Harper Valley PTA, and they were going to get this young lady, and then when they call her before the school board, she just started telling on everybody else. She said this widow, she ought to keep her shades down, and then there's a milkman coming around standing in her yard peeping under those shades, and just spilled the beans on everybody. It was one of those kind of situations. We don't want that to be a basis, in my opinion, for enhancing a punishment. If you've got one of these repeaters of this kind of conduct, you're going to be able to get him or her legitimately. So all that my amendment would strike is the language that relates to using a
