to read a sentence; mental illness, mental defect or intoxication. How would determination be made that the person was or was not intoxicated at the time of the murder if indeed there was no one there to corroborate at the time whether he was or wasn't intoxicated. Could not anyone plead intoxication after the murder, and how would the court be able to determine whether he was or was not intoxicated.

SENATOR LUEDTKE: Of course it would be, if I may just continue, Mr. President. It would be the same as with any other problem of proof. If that were pleaded--plead and the pleading would have to be followed up with proof--I'm sure they would have to show to the court that he was in effect, and actually, drunk at the time this prevailed, otherwise I'm sure no court would be persuaded by just an argument that I had something to drink and therefore, I was out of my mind.

SENATOR STAHMER: But as a practical matter, he might have been drunk and not been able to prove it because no one else was there at the time.

SENATOR LUEDTKE: That's true, the reverse english is true. That would be true too.

SENATOR STAHMER: I can see why you're concerned about this bill. Thank you.

PRESIDENT: Senator Rasmussen was next to speak but, Senator Rasmussen, Senator Chambers also was, indicated a desire to speak. Do you want to yield the floor to him, thank you. Go ahead, Senator Chambers.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Mr. President and Members of the Legislature. I'll be much briefer this time, I hope, than I was the first time around, but this is something that distresses me quite a bit. I just want to say a few things about methods of education around the world and throughout history. Adolph Eichmann was a man who presided over the extermination of 6½ million Jews, an untold number of Eastern Europeans and gypsies who were considered inferior human beings. He said that when time came to meet his maker, he would leap into his grave laughing because he had dispatched this many people. When time came for him to stand trial, he ran like a rat and squealed like a pig, but he was brought to justice and executed. Now, this man was considered by a lot of people the worst criminal who ever lived or at least among the worst but even in a situation like
