

home, come on I will take you home, you have had too much to drink. So here is a good samaritan. This good samaritan is doing what we have advertised, publicized and pushed, give the fellow a ride home, don't let him drive his own car. So the good samaritan, let's say, is myself. I like to be a good samaritan. And let's say that Senator Hall over here, he is the intoxicated person. I wouldn't call him drunk but he is intoxicated. So being in the bar, being friendly, and I get to know Senator Hall and he is a nice young fellow and I say, hey, I will take this young man home. So Tim says, well, all right, he says, I will go with you. So I get him in the car and here I am cold sober driving down the street and my taillight is out and the police stop me and they check everything and they get to looking at Tim and (mumble, mumble) like this and so they look in Tim's pocket and on the inside of his coat unbeknowns to me, the good samaritan, is a half a pint of Jack Daniels Black Label that is open and half gone. I didn't know that, but now do you know who is in trouble? I am in trouble because I was being a good samaritan. This isn't right. The same way with the cab driver, he is in trouble. The bartender calls a friend to take him home. They are in trouble. What are you going to do? Was I supposed to pat...that might not be too bad if it was a girl, but pat Tim down before I got him in the car to see if he had a half a pint? No. So this is a bad law. We have got enough laws. I will go a step further. I had the occasion to talk to some state patrolmen. I know quite a few of them and quite a few of them know me. We get acquainted under different circumstances. And you know what, they said, you know what, Rex, you know...after a while we get on a first name basis, I feel that they are more comfortable and I am too on a first name basis, we can't enforce that law. How are we...are we going to stop these big vans, stop all these people? We have got a thousand and one things to do on the interstate and on the highway besides worrying about something like that. Sure we are after people that are intoxicated, but if we see a van or a bus, oh, and a bus, you can't have any more lobby trips, you know, with bars on them because you can't have this in those buses, but I wouldn't want to use that as a good example. But nobody is safe underneath this bill. It is such an encompassing bill. It tries to take all of everybody's sins and all the problems and we are going to pass a law and take care of this problem. The problem isn't going to go away. It is still going to be there. It isn't going to be enforced. We have laws on the books and I
