

television programs and makes money. He gives radio programs and makes money. He is provided free cars by auto dealers, the equivalent of money. And the players, who watch all of this money being earned by just the coach, are told don't you ask for a dime. Look how unfair this is. The coach can get a contract with a shoe company in excess of $50,000 to get the players to wear the shoes, but if one of those players would put his feet in a pair of shoes and get a dime for it he loses his eligibility because a player is not allowed to do promotion and make a nickel for himself. So if he can't make a nickel, you know what would happen if they gave him a dime. But the coach can make this money. There is discussion as to how ethical it is for coaches of amateur, so called amateur teams, to make money in this fashion, but nothing is done about it, and there are no NCAA rules against it. The scholarship manipulation, that I mentioned the other day, occurs when out of state players are encouraged to either take an apartment in Lincoln and live there, or take one in their name so it appears they live there, and then they are viewed as instate students and they pay the instate rate for tuition. The hourly rate for an instate student is $38, the out of state is $103, the difference is $65 per hour. So if these figures are correct, and I was given them by people who...contacted the University, if you just take 45 of the players and view them as out of state, and they take a maximum of 12 hours, it would be a savings of $35,100 that the University has made as a result of "misrepresenting" the true status of that player. I had mentioned that the Pell grant is based on need, and that the maximum that a person can receive is $1,800. NCAA rules will not allow players to receive that much. So a player qualified to receive the $1,800 gets $900. What happens to the rest of it? It goes into the budget of the University. To double check this, they may have gotten word on it, we checked at the Athletic Department. Do you know nobody at the University of Nebraska Athletic Department knew what happened to the amount in excess of $900 in a Pell grant that a player was entitled to? They suggested that a call be made to the Administration Office, with those who deal with aid.

SPEAKER NICHOL: One minute.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: And do you know that those who deal with aid did not know either. Those are the ones whose budget is not to be cut. So these are some of the ways that money is
