

think some people were genuinely mistaken when they got caught up in the web that we are now entangled in and I'm not the spider who wove the web. Where we are now, we got here through a logical progression of events that could be foreseen in the beginning and that's why I said raising any number to the zero power always gives you one and we'll be right back where we started from and I said that and I meant it and others knew it too. Some of the new people who just got here didn't believe that this would happen. They didn't think we could arrive at this point, but here we are with each other, looking at each other, smiling, folding paper, chatting amiably, eating food, reassuring me that somebody is listening...

PRESIDENT: Presiding.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: You said my time is up?

PRESIDENT: Presiding...in addition to all those virtues...we're presiding.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Presiding, long sufferingly, presiding, but as much as the Lieutenant Governor makes compared to the little bit we make, then we expect this of him. I read in a column the other day that the mind can absorb no more than the seat can stand or endure, but that's not really true necessarily because sometime something can be said when you're seat tells you it's over that will make your mind say, oh, but it's not, I've got to stay here. So some are going to stay to the bitter end to make sure that in the same way that Senator Hall stepped out for a moment and came back and things had changed so much that he didn't even know what was happening, why or how, they feel that if they left here for hours and came back tomorrow, no telling what might have occurred.

PRESIDENT: One minute.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: But I would assure them that nothing will occur. We will simply adjourn and go wherever we had decided we're going to go this evening. The most enjoyable time in the session for me today was Senator DeCamp in his creative way came up with the stratagem that he offered. You all called the question before I had a chance to speak, but at that point I was in a no lose situation. If you overrode the Chair, then the bill would be in the form I'd
