

January 10, 1986

determination. The reason I want to make it possible for one member to compel that presence is based on the same notion that allows one member to place the house under call or seek to do so. The incident that led to a realization that attendance could be compelled, I think I should mention again so that people understand what I'm talking about when I say games can be played by a majority who wants to have the house under call. The majority of people here needed some votes to get a bill or an amendment on school aid voted the way they wanted it, so to keep everybody present who was here at the time while these airplanes that were delayed by the weather were coming in, they placed the house under call. I attempted to raise the call after we sat here a good while and it was unsuccessful because those who wanted those votes had the majority so they kept us here. So I said then if we must stay here, everybody should be here and, therefore, we should summon those people who are absent. And because the presiding officer understood what was going on, he issued the order and they began to go out and summon them. Now, what Senator Hannibal is suggesting by his amendment is that a majority of those who would vote could compel the attendance of those who are not here. I don't think it should be based on that majority because the same game could be played under Senator Hannibal's motion as he has it now, or his amendment, as was being played that night. It should be possible for one member to invoke the provisions of this rule and, therefore, I believe that if we have a situation where the house is under call and we're going to be kept under call for a substantial period of time for whatever reason the majority desires, then any member should be able to invoke the rule that can compel the attendance of anybody who is not here and, therefore, I am trying to offer this amendment, I'm offering it and I hope you will adopt it if you adopt anything, which says one member can cause the compelling of those people. If the majority does not want that done, then all they have to do is agree to raise the call, but if they can keep the house under call for the remainder of the legislative day, then any member should be able to invoke the rule that says compel the attendance of the other people because some of those people absent may have a significant vote on the other side of the issue. The majority knowing that is not going to compel those people to be brought in because it would hurt the case that they want to make. That's why I am offering the amendment to Senator Hannibal's amendment.