

I hope you won't regret. I'd like to go back over some of the points that I made previously so that you can understand, again, what is happening. This is an issue which unfortunately and unfairly has caused divisiveness within our enforcement ranks. It has pitted, if you will, the State Patrol against the police and the sheriffs. They are one side of this issue, and the patrol is on the other side of the issue. It makes a move away from local control to state control. My people are saying to me local control, we want local control. As proposed, this says that the patrol is going to identify the problems, report it to the Liquor Commission, and then what is the Liquor Commission going to do? Are they then going to tell the patrol that they are to go out and enforce it? I don't think it is going to work to separate, if you will, the enforcement and the regulatory agencies. I think the enforcement and the regulatory agencies need to be together, not separated into two different entities. Eighty percent of the work of the Liquor Control commissioners amounts to audits, book audits, content audits, if you will, of wholesalers and retailers. They also must be very cognizant of who the owners are of these establishments, and who the operators are of these establishments. You have to sometimes go back into corporation bylaws to find out who the owners and operators are of the liquor establishments, who the person on the premise is that is responsible. I'm not sure that the patrol people want to spend all of these hours, or really know that they are going to need to spend all of these hours in bookwork type of things as opposed to the kind of enforcement that they normally do. Iowa, which is a control state, Iowa right now is contacting our Liquor Commission to try to implement a method which we have been doing by keeping the enforcement and regulatory commissioners together. And they are completely control state. They are wanting to pattern after us, and here we are trying to change. As I have pointed out to you, Colorado and Kentucky are reverting back to a policy that they have found not to be workable. The patrol people generally work in shifts, designated shifts. I know there are some exceptions to these rules, obviously as in any agency. The Liquor Control Commission people do not work specific hours in the method in which they implement their duties and responsibilities. I think this is going to cause a great deal of problem for the patrol to deal with. I'm not going to say a great deal of problem, because they are more flexible than that, and I know that Colonel Tagg is more flexible than that. But it
