

SENATOR SCHMIT: Any campus.

SENATOR WARNER: Well, I didn't have a different answer for each one, but I just thought I'd ask.

SENATOR SCHMIT: (inaudible)...at the time, Senator, you haven't lost a bit. You haven't changed a bit since Ag College 40 years ago.

SENATOR WARNER: I assume you know the answer, so I want to be careful that if I respond it is correct. Would that be a safe assumption on my part?

SENATOR SCHMIT: That is safe. I never try to ask a question I don't know the answer to.

SENATOR WARNER: Why don't you tell what it is and I'll confirm it then? I don't want to mix words, Loran. I cannot off the top of my head recite that. I can tell you in general terms that, you know, they...I know there are arrangements. I don't recall specifically what they are campus by campus, and rather than give misinformation, I'd want to check it before I did.

SENATOR SCHMIT: Thank you, Senator Warner.

SENATOR WARNER: (Interruption)...but since you have checked it, I'd be very delighted to hear what it is.

SENATOR SCHMIT: Let me just say this, it's a very liberal policy, one which allows a professor at the University, underpaid, overworked, abused as they are to take from their busy schedule and act as consultant, act as advisor, act in a professional capacity, in most instances to anyone who will hire them for a very, usually, lucrative fee. Let me tell you this. The salaries paid to professors are not the total sum of their income. Let me tell you something else. Why are we here today? We are here today because a certain group of individuals who are supposed to base their judgment upon the economic indicators that are forthcoming say to a certain point in time that it wasn't important what happened to agriculture, that the economic machinery of this state would continue to function. If the red-haired young man over here with the camera would want to step aside, I'd appreciate it. The point I want to make is this. The system will function, but it will not function without
