

September 29, 1992 LB 20

years when, in fact, the reality is that the vast majority of recipients of ADC benefits stay on the program for less than two years. But the point is that we need to get a handle on this program. We need to manage it better. We need to find employment for ADC recipients. We need to aggressively seek those opportunities by identifying the individuals who can work and get them in the work force as soon as possible and provide...and make sure that those individuals who really are in need and who are trying are given the benefits, and that those who have simply opted out of the system altogether we need to adopt a different standard for them. And I think that's what the real issue is out there today. There's a real crying concern that we are, in fact, giving money to individuals who really have opted out of the system, who don't care, who are lazy, who are doing things that with whatever benefits they get that are not consistent with trying to get themselves out of the welfare cycle. And I think all of us in this body, probably a hundred percent of us would agree, as Senator Chambers remarked earlier that that...it is not his intention to continue a system that gives to those individuals those kinds of benefits without looking carefully at it. But, again, in this program we're talking about approximately 500 individuals. If we are...if, on the one hand, in the Medicaid program we're talking about managing or providing managed care for 120,000 eligible Medicaid recipients, it seems to me that we can get a handle and our arms around a universe of 500 individuals who are on this program at any given time in any one year. If we do that, I think we need to go to the Department of Social Services and demand from them information that's going to give us an opportunity to see what kind...what is the nature of this universe. Who are we talking about? Are these individuals who are seeking education? Are these individuals who are seeking employment? I think what we would find probably is that 60 or 70 percent figure that applies to the number of people who remain on welfare applies to these 500 people as well and that they are individuals who are motivated to do something with their lives. Those who are not, at some point we're going to have to deal with them differently. We're going to have to establish different standards and establish different criteria because the citizens of this state and across the country are demanding accountability for the programs that we implement in state government. And...but accountability has to apply across the board and accountability must apply to all programs, not just programs that right now seem glitzy and jazzy to cut, like ADC and Medicaid and other programs. We have to be accountable in this programs, but we